Could it be that even the HIV/AIDS theory is based on economic instead of scientific criteria? The documentary film by ANNE SONO, which will be shown in the Babylon cinema on 2 separate screens (German and English), investigates this question.

I won't go quietly

6 women – one diagnosis, HIV positive and nevertheless healthy

Documentary film by Anne Sono, 81 min

On 24 March 2012 at 3 p.m.
Babylon, Rosa-Luxemburg-Str. 30 in 10178 Berlin
Followed by a discussion with the filmmaker, physician
Juliane Sacher and Dr John Virapen

Is HIV a fatal diagnosis? Are people who test HIV-positive simply walking time bombs, and is the deterioration of their health unavoidable? In fact there are people who, in spite of this diagnosis, never get ill. Some of them have been healthy now for decades. What is the secret of their health? Why does the general public never hear about their cases? Shouldn't these people be the subject of medical interest and extensive research? However, just the opposite is true: they are ignored, fought against, threatened and criminalised. Why? Their lives may actually hold an answer that could advance world health.
